Disability community large and contested in battleground

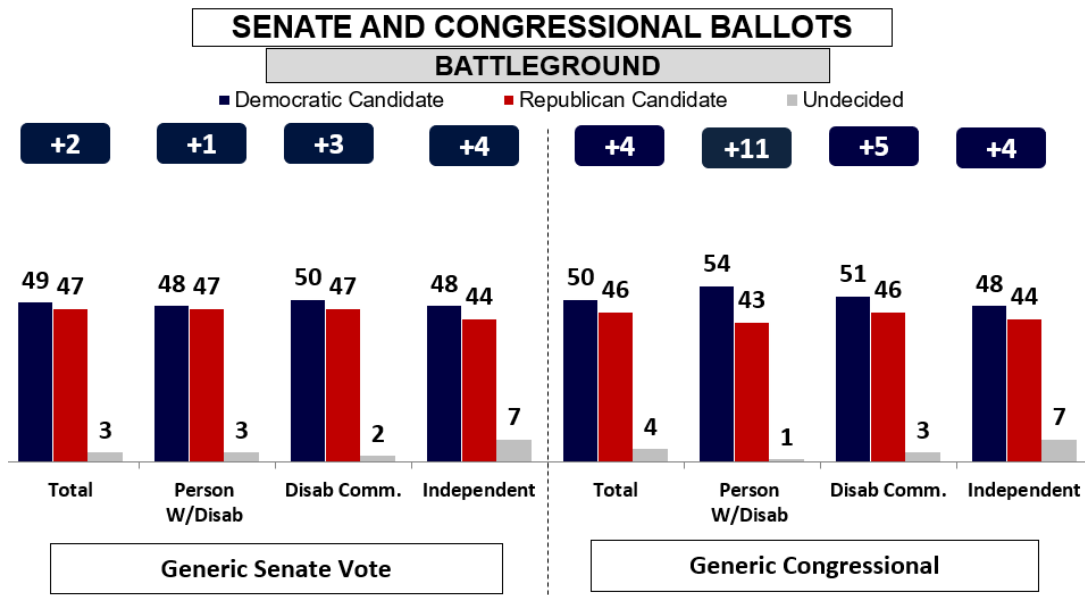

This memo provides a summary of key findings from our March phone survey in the full presidential and Senate battleground for the 2020 election.¹ It was conducted by Democracy Corps, and included 590 respondents who self-identify as having a disability, having a family member with a disability, or having a close friend with a disability (the disability community).

- The disability community is more than half the battleground. Over half of the electorate in the battleground (59 percent) self-identifies as having a disability (16 percent), having a family member with a disability (32 percent) or having a close friend with a disability (11 percent).

The disability community in the battleground resembles voters overall—white (73 percent) and people of color (26 percent), college (60 percent) and non-college voters (36 percent), urban (54 percent) and rural voters (46 percent).

- The disability community is electorally contested. These voters lean slightly more Democratic than voters outside of the disability community, but they are still politically contested at the presidential, Senate, and Congressional level. Their support for Democratic candidates is virtually identical to voters overall, though voters facing a personal disability are slightly more Democratic than the broader disability community.

¹ A phone poll of 1,000 registered voters in a 16-state Presidential and Senate battleground was conducted by phone March 9-16, 2020 from a voter-file sample. 67% of respondents were reached on cell phones in order to accurately reflect the American electorate. The margin of error is +/- 3 percentage points. The states included Arizona, Colorado, Florida, Georgia, Iowa, Nevada, New Hampshire, New Mexico, North Carolina, Maine, Michigan, Minnesota, Ohio, Pennsylvania, Virginia, Wisconsin

- The disability community is focused on issues that directly impact their lives. Voters in this community focus more on Social Security and Medicare than voters overall, and voters facing personal disabilities are far and away the most likely to cite government disfunction and prescription drug prices as important issues.

Now thinking about the 2020 election. As you think about elections coming up in November 2020, which two or three of the following issues are the most important as you decide whom to support?

- Community’s agenda draws broad public support but is not being addressed. Voters broadly agree that presidential campaigns should be made accessible to people with disabilities. A 90 percent majority of voters overall and a 91 percent of voters in the disability community believe it is very or somewhat important candidates for President make their campaign accessible. These views have intensity, with a 69 percent majority of voters overall and a 73 percent majority of voters in the disability community who find it very important candidates make their campaign accessible.

Similarly broad majorities of voters describe themselves as more likely to support candidates who ensure children with disabilities get the education and training they need to succeed and similar majorities describe themselves as more likely to support candidates who back job and career opportunities for people with disabilities. The intensity of these issues is nearly as high among voters overall as it is in the disability community.

Please read through the list below of things our leaders can do to address the challenges facing people with disabilities. For each, please indicate whether this stand would make you much more likely, somewhat more, a little more or no more likely to support a candidate for elected office who makes this a priority.

	Ensuring that children with disabilities get the education and training they need to succeed.				Expanding job and career opportunities for people with disabilities, so they can succeed just like anyone else.

Conclusion

The disability community makes up a solid majority of the battleground electorate, yet few campaigns make sure their materials are fully accessible to everybody despite the clear evidence that it could be electorally rewarding. There is broad agreement among both voters overall and voters within this disability community that more needs to be done to help people with disabilities integrate into the work force, and campaigns would do well to pay more attention to addressing these issues.
